Alexander Holder, a private banker, was given as security a coronet of great value set with thirty-nine beryls. He brought it home and after showing it to his son Arthur and his niece Mary, locked it in an old bureau. Later in the evening Arthur asked his father for an advance on his allowance, which was refused. Two o'clock in the morning the baker was awakened by a noise, and was horrified to find his son standing beside the bureau holding in his hands the coronet which was twisted out of shape, and one corner which contained three beryls missing. He sent for the police and gave his son in charge, and next day went to Sherlock Holmes. The detective was not convinced of the young man's guilt, and working on a few clues, discovered that Sir George Burnwell had come to the house to see Mary who had innocently told him about the coronet and he had persuaded her to steal it. Arthur, worrying over his financial condition, was unable to sleep, and heard Mary go down stairs. He saw her take the coronet and give it to Burnwell. He gave chase, and in the fight that ensued the coronet had been damaged and Burnwell escaped with the broken off corner. Arthur took the blame rather than let Mary suffer. Holmes went to Burnwell and discovered that he had already sold the beryls, which Holmes repurchased.
